In 2009, I was thrilled when Lynn Nottage became the second African American woman to win the Pulitzer Prize for Drama for Ruined. A year earlier, the Goodman had commissioned and premiered the play, which depicts the plight of a group of women in the war-torn Democratic Republic of Congo. In 2017, Lynn became the first woman in history to win the prize twice—this time for Sweat, a fervent cri de coeur that centers around steelworkers in Reading, Pennsylvania, on the brink of losing their once-steady jobs. After premiering at Oregon Shakespeare Festival, the play enjoyed a Broadway run, where The New York Times critic Ben Brantley called it "bracingly topical."

When I read the play—which toggles back and forth in time between 2000 and 2008—I thought Goodman audiences would appreciate its adroit examination of the deindustrialization of American cities, its incisive portrayal of race relations and its lively characters whose quotidian daily concerns belie the vast scope of their story.

In addition to Ruined, the Goodman has produced two of Lynn’s other plays, both directed by Chuck Smith: Crumbs from the Table of Joy (2006) and By the Way, Meet Vera Stark (2013). In these works, Lynn used research to exhume African American history and view it through a contemporary lens. For Sweat, Lynn once again engaged in extensive research, traveling to Reading and interviewing residents about their economic status and the changing landscape of their town. She found the citizens keen to speak with her, and I believe their eagerness to share their situations is evident in the play, which shimmers with heart-rending detail.

For this new production, I approached director Ron OJ Parson, a longtime resident artist at Court Theatre, who last directed at the Goodman two decades ago—1998’s Let Me Live. In addition to his work at Court, Ron has directed at countless theaters in Chicago—including Steppenwolf, Victory Gardens and The Onyx Theatre Ensemble, where he served as artistic director.

I am elated to welcome Lynn and Ron back to the Goodman. I am confident that this Pulitzer Prize-winning play will be as enthralling as it is thought-provoking, as we look back on the first decade of this century with the perspective of all that has happened in our nation since.

Enjoy Sweat,

Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Lynn Nottage explores the damage done when shrinking opportunities pit worker against worker

By Thomas Connors

As historians often try to make clear, the us-and-them divisiveness that defines American life today did not spring full-blown from the election of 2016: our cultural discord goes back decades. And while its causes are varied, the threads of race and the economy are woven deep into the fabric of this dilemma. With Sweat—for which she won her second Pulitzer Prize—playwright Lynn Nottage unravels these knots and reminds us that so much of what sets us at odds is often beyond our control.

Set in a bar in blue-collar Reading, Pennsylvania (one of the poorest cities in the country), Sweat moves back and forth between 2000 and 2008 as it charts the achievements and defeats of residents whose lives depend upon the fortunes of a local factory. It’s a rough ride, not only for the strains of the work (or the lack thereof), but for the way in which the pinch of physical and emotional hunger can gut the deepest friendships.

“The plays deals with the heartbeat of America,” says director Ron OJ Parson. “I know that sounds like an old Chevy commercial, but that’s really what it is all about. It deals with all the societal issues we are dealing with today, including drug addiction, alcoholism, racism, the loss of jobs, class.”

A resident artist at Court Theatre and a co-founder and former artistic director of The Onyx Theatre Ensemble, Parson is drawn to plays that have an historical element to them, such as the work of August Wilson, which he has directed a number of times. Although Nottage isn’t diving into the deep past with Sweat, in the ever-accelerating age we live in, today is quickly yesterday and the present is history before we know it. “Richness of character also interests me,” notes Parson. “I like audiences to feel what's on stage—not just see it, not just hear it. I think when you have a richness of character, as you do in Lynn’s plays, you're able to make people do that.”

Keith Kupferer, whose Goodman credits include appearances in Ellen Fairey’s Support Group for Men and Yasmina Reza’s God of Carnage, is one of the actors charged with bringing audiences into the world his character inhabits. Kupferer plays Stan, who once did factory work but is now behind the bar. “I know exactly from where my character is coming,” says the actor. “I’ve worked many jobs and am attuned to the blue-collar sensibility. The play may be educational to the more affluent members of the audience, but I already know the realities of how the ‘other half’ lives. That’s why I believe this play is so important and beautiful and necessary at this point in time.”
“The blue-collar world resonates with me in a couple of different ways,” shares Steve Casillas, who plays Oscar, a Colombian-American who works in the bar while hoping for a job at the plant. “I never worked a blue-collar job quite like the characters in the play, but some of my family members have. I remember hearing their stories of 16 to 18 hour shifts. My family members have always been extremely hardworking and I believe their work ethic trickled down to me. I bartend—and I know that’s not a blue-collar job, but I've had my fair share of 12-hour shifts on my feet.”

Like Kupferer, Casillas thinks Sweat hits home in its realistic depiction and artful dissection of lives tottering on the edge. “What I love about the play is that it is a big eye-opener on how a lot of Americans live and struggle. Living here in Chicago you can be distracted by the city lifestyle. It's easy to forget that there are small towns all over America that depend solely on work in factories. It makes brunch and cupcake shops seem extremely inessential.”

Although Nottage is fearless in exploring the social disintegration that so often trails the struggle to make ends meet, Sweat is a play about people, not an editorial. It may be just a play, but if an audience can “feel what’s onstage,” as Parson hopes, perhaps hearts and minds can be altered. “Theater should make us think about who we are,” asserts Parson. “Theater can change the world.”

Reading, Pennsylvania: A Brief History

By Neena Arndt

Lynn Nottage sets her play Sweat in Reading, Pennsylvania—a once-prosperous city 48 miles northwest of Philadelphia—captivated by its early 21st century economic struggles. Reading’s story, from its earliest pre-Revolutionary beginnings to its apex in the 1930s to its current state of economic decline, mirrors that of many cities across the nation that have undergone sweeping changes in their economic landscapes.

Thomas and Richard Penn, sons of Pennsylvania founder William Penn, founded Reading in 1748, naming it after the British town from which their family hailed. Britons and Germans settled the area, with the British controlling local affairs until the Revolutionary War. The town and its surrounding region became known for manufacturing iron products—including cannons, rifles and ammunition for Washington’s troops. In the 1820s, workers completed two major canals: the Schuykill Canal and the Union Canal, which connected Reading with Philadelphia and the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers, allowing cargo to be transported to and from the area.
In 1833, only a few years after the canals’ completion, the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad was founded, rendering the canals almost obsolete. For more than a century this railway transported coal from the Pennsylvania Coal Region to the eastern United States; though now defunct, the Reading Railroad lives on as one of the four railroads on the Monopoly game board.

Early in the 20th century, Reading increased in population as its industries grew; it was known at various times for manufacturing bicycles, textiles, hosiery, automobiles and pretzels, while maintaining its production of steel and other iron products. By 1930, it was a bustling city of 111,000, making it the nation’s 76th largest—slightly outsizing Miami, Florida and Sacramento, California.

By the mid-20th century, some of Reading’s industries were in decline and, like many cities that had once prospered on the profits of industry, it experienced a decrease in population and an increase in crime. In 1972, Hurricane Agnes caused flooding in the already struggling city: the Schuykill River, which had once made Reading a transportation hub, overflowed its banks.

After bottoming out at 78,380 people in 1990, the population edged up due to an influx of Latinx transplants from New York City, and because Philadelphia’s northwest suburbs had sprawled to the edges of Reading. By 2010, the population had rallied to just over 88,000; Hispanic or Latinx residents made up 58.2% of the city, while African Americans comprised 13.2%.

Reading, which had maintained its German identity throughout the centuries since its founding—transformed over the course of a few decades into a diverse city. People of all races needed not only to make the cultural adjustments necessary to live peaceably together, but also to compete against one another for the relatively few jobs still available. More than 26% of the population lived below the poverty line in 2010. In 2011, The New York Times called Reading “America’s poorest city.”

It was this combustible combination of economic desperation and racial tensions that propelled Lynn Nottage to visit the city—and begin writing Sweat.

about us

AMERICA’S “BEST REGIONAL THEATRE” (Time magazine), Goodman Theatre is a premier not-for-profit organization distinguished by the excellence and scope of its artistic programming and civic engagement. Led by Artistic Director Robert Falls and Executive Director Roche Schulfer, the theater’s artistic priorities include new play development (more than 150 world or American premieres in the past three decades), large scale musical theater works and reimagined classics (celebrated revivals include Falls’ productions of Death of a Salesman and The Iceman Cometh). Goodman Theatre artists and productions have earned two Pulitzer Prizes, 22 Tony Awards, over 160 Jeff Awards and many more accolades. In addition, the Goodman is the first theater in the world to produce all 10 plays in August Wilson’s “American Century Cycle;” and its annual holiday tradition A Christmas Carol, now in its fifth decade, has created a new generation of theatergoers. The Goodman also frequently serves as a production partner with local off-Loop theaters and national and international companies by providing financial support or physical space for a variety of artistic endeavors.

Committed to three core values of Quality, Diversity and Community, the Goodman proactively makes inclusion the fabric of the institution and develops education and community engagement programs that support arts as education. This practice uses the process of artistic creation to inspire youth, lifelong learners and audiences to find and/or enhance their voices, stories and abilities. The Goodman’s Alice Rapoport Center for Education and Engagement is the home of such programming, most offered free of charge, and has vastly expanded the theater’s ability to touch the lives of Chicagoland citizens (with 85% of youth participants coming from underserved communities) since its 2016 opening.

Goodman Theatre was founded by William O. Goodman and his family in honor of their son Kenneth, an important figure in Chicago’s cultural renaissance in the early 1900s. The Goodman family’s legacy lives on through the continued work and dedication of Kenneth’s family, including Albert Ivar Goodman, who with his late mother, Edith-Marie Appleton, contributed the necessary funds for the creation of the new Goodman center in 2000.

Today, Goodman Theatre leadership also includes the distinguished members of the Artistic Collective: Brian Dennehy, Rebecca Gilman, Henry Godinez, Dael Orlandersmith, Steve Scott, Chuck Smith, Regina Taylor, Henry Wishcamper and Mary Zimmerman. David W. Fox, Jr. is Chair of Goodman Theatre’s Board of Trustees, Denise Stefan Ginascol is Women’s Board President and Megan McCarthy Hayes is President of the Scenemakers Board for young professionals.
