A Note from Artistic Director Robert Falls

For more than two decades, I have admired playwright Lisa Loomer, whose droll observations of modern life have long enlivened the American theater. After beginning her career as an actor and comedian, Lisa found playwriting success in 1994 with her play The Waiting Room, in which three women from different time periods meet in a doctor’s office, each coping with the effects of her era’s female body modification de rigueur: foot binding, corsetry and breast augmentation. Since then, Lisa’s plays have included Living Out, which centers around a Salvadoran nanny and the white woman she works for, and Distracted, which explores what it means to pay attention—or not—in the Information Age.

Several years ago, Oregon Shakespeare Festival commissioned Lisa to write Roe as part of their American Revolutions program, a multi-decade effort to commission and develop plays about pivotal moments in American history. Roe premiered at OSF in 2016 and went on to enjoy success in cities around the nation. When I encountered the script, I admired its sly humor and ambitious excavation of the behind-the-scenes stories of Roe v. Wade’s lawyers, Linda Coffee and Sarah Weddington, and plaintiff, Norma McCorvey. I have long been familiar with the Supreme Court case, but knew little about the women behind the monumental decision; Roe takes its viewers beyond the headlines and history books to meet the brave, flawed people who changed American life. Because reproductive rights remain as controversial as they were in the 1970s, I felt strongly that Lisa’s even-handed peek into history should be a part of our 2019/2020 Season.

In addition to welcoming Lisa, I am thrilled to once again work with acclaimed Chicago director Vanessa Stalling, whose masterful production of The Wolves sold out its 2018 run in the Owen Theatre. Vanessa’s other accomplishments include a Jeff Award for Best Director for her critically acclaimed production of Photograph 51 at Court Theatre, and her deft adaptation and direction of United Flight 232 at the House Theatre of Chicago. Vanessa’s work combines her deep understanding of text with her knack for unconventional staging to pack an emotional and intellectual punch. I consider her one of the finest directors to emerge from our theater community.

I invite you to enjoy Roe—a nimble, thought-provoking look at women who are not household names, but whose actions have, in one way or another, affected us all.

Robert Falls
Artistic Director of Goodman Theatre
In the thought-provoking play Roe, playwright Lisa Loomer and director Vanessa Stalling give new voice to women who made history. Here, they offer some insights into the lessons that history offers.

The great Studs Terkel bemoaned the fact that we suffer from what he called “national Alzheimer’s,” a collective forgetfulness and a sometimes willful failure to ponder our past. Was your play informed at all by the recognition that we may have already forgotten the momentousness of Roe v. Wade and the true facts of the case?

LISA: Yes, absolutely! We talk about Roe, we argue about Roe, but few among us know what was actually said in the case or in the Court’s decision. So there is some history to be considered in the play and there is also much argument over what that “history” actually was. There is an ironic discussion about “truth” throughout the play that looks at how one’s “truth” is influenced by race, class, gender, religion and sexual identity. That said, you will hear some of the actual case, and you can decide for yourself what you think about it.

There is so much going on in the play—so many people, so many scenes, so many different time periods. Was there a person or a moment in this story that really started the ball rolling for you?

LISA: I was fascinated by Sarah Weddington, the lawyer, and by Norma McCorvey, the plaintiff. Sarah is clearly a heroine. She is one of the great feminists of our time. But I was also fascinated by Norma, who is the less “sympathetic” character, and by Flip Benham, the head of Operation Rescue who befriended Norma. Were his motives purely political or did he really care about her soul? But there is another character who, for me, is at the heart of this play and our cultural divide: Connie Gonzalez. There’s much talk of being a good Christian in the play and in our society. Connie [Norma’s partner] represents just that. She is non-judgmental, she is loving, she is fair. She’s not in the history books, but she exists, as do others like her, and her voice was important to me in this argument.

VANESSA: I was drawn to this piece because I’m interested in how art is addressing the divisive moment we find ourselves in and because I have a vested interest in women’s access to healthcare. I’m deeply concerned about how these wedge issues impact democracy.

The play is so much about the loaded concept of “narrative.” What is the responsibility you assume in presenting real people in what is—even as you incorporate the actual record—a narrative of your own creation?

LISA: It’s a terrible responsibility. A great deal of the play is based on actual conversations and actual events documented in both Weddington’s and McCorvey’s books. But the fact that they are onstage together arguing about history, that is my invention. Neither protagonist would be happy about it. I have tried to make clear what is theatrical convention and what actually happened. That said, I apologize to both protagonists for putting them on stage together. As an artist, I thought it was a way to look at why we cannot talk to each other as fellow Americans.

In working on the play, did you develop a deeper appreciation for one side of the argument or the other?

LISA: I gained a deeper understanding of why people are against abortion than I previously may have had. I also have a more nuanced understanding of the concept of “choice” and how it pertains to all aspects of our lives—including our religious affiliations, whom we choose as a partner and, of course, about who gets to make choices about a woman’s body. Clearly, it cannot be the government and must be the woman, herself.

VANESSA: The play affirmed for me the notion that, as long as there are people who don’t feel of value to this country and who don’t have access to power, there will always be a threat to democracy. In this play, we see Norma as a person who must operate out of self-interest because she lacks access to power and doesn’t feel valued by society. It’s understandable that she is in a vulnerable position that causes her to be persuaded by whichever “side” is making her feel of value in the moment, or as if they are fighting for her interests, even if ultimately they are not.
It’s not easy to write a piece that successfully reflects actual issues and works as fully engaging drama. How does that play out on stage?

VANESSA: Lisa provides the piece the license to be what it is: an exciting night at the theater that embraces all theatrical elements. She pulls back the curtain and asks the audience to embrace the performance, with onstage costume changes and direct addresses from the characters. This license, and Lisa’s gifted abilities for comedic timing and flow, allows for the piece to travel across significant leaps in time and space. On the surface, the notion of a man in an elf costume ragging about the holidays might seem little more than a stand-up routine. Tell us a bit about the character Sedaris has created and the story he tells.

AMERICA’S “BEST REGIONAL THEATRE” (Time magazine), Goodman Theatre is a premier not-for-profit organization distinguished by the excellence and scope of its artistic programming and civic engagement. Led by Artistic Director Robert Falls and Executive Director Roche Schulfer, the theater’s artistic priorities include new play development (more than 150 world or American premieres in the past three decades), large scale musical theater works and reimagined classics (celebrated revivals include Falls’ productions of Death of a Salesman and The Iceman Cometh). Goodman Theatre artists and productions have earned two Pulitzer Prizes, 22 Tony Awards, over 160 Jeff Awards and many more accolades. In addition, the Goodman is the first theater in the world to produce all 10 plays in August Wilson’s “American Century Cycle;” and its annual holiday tradition A Christmas Carol, now in its fourth decade, has created a new generation of theatergoers. The Goodman also frequently serves as a production partner with local off-Loop theaters and national and international companies by providing financial support or physical space for a variety of artistic endeavors.

Committed to three core values of Quality, Diversity and Community, the Goodman proactively makes inclusion the fabric of the institution and develops education and community engagement programs that support arts as education. This practice uses the process of artistic creation to inspire youth, lifelong learners and audiences to find and/or enhance their voices, stories and abilities. The Goodman’s Alice Rapoport Center for Education and Engagement is the home of such programming, most offered free of charge, and has vastly expanded the theater’s ability to touch the lives of Chicagoland citizens (with 85% of youth participants coming from underserved communities) since its 2016 opening.

Goodman Theatre was founded by William O. Goodman and his family in honor of their son Kenneth, an important figure in Chicago’s cultural renaissance in the early 1900s. The Goodman family’s legacy lives on through the continued work and dedication of Kenneth’s family, including Albert Ivar Goodman, who with his late mother, Edith-Marie Appleton, contributed the necessary funds for the creation of the new Goodman center in 2000.

Today, Goodman Theatre leadership also includes the distinguished members of the Artistic Collective: Brian Dennehy, Rebecca Gilman, Henry Godinez, Dael Orlandersmith, Steve Scott, Kimberly Senior, Chuck Smith, Regina Taylor, Henry Wishcamper and Mary Zimmerman. David W. Fox, Jr. is Chairman of Goodman Theatre’s Board of Trustees, Denise Stefan Ginascol is Women’s Board President and Megan McCarthy Hayes is President of the Scenemakers Board for young professionals.
